A Message from the Publisher

The National Council of Farmer Cooperatives publishes here the 1998 edition of the Journal of Cooperatives, a collection of research and study on cooperative issues relevant to government, academia, and cooperative businesses. NCFC recognizes the importance of sharing timely information stimulating cross dialog between these various sectors. This dialog and the continual search for best methods is essential to advance cooperative efforts to better meet the agricultural needs of our world in the coming twenty-first century.

Journal Editor John Dunn has brought together a collaboration of works authored by both government and academic researchers. Randall E. Torgerson, Bruce J. Reynolds, and Thomas W. Gray explore the evolution of agricultural cooperative thought, theory, and purpose in the United States and ways cooperatives might provide some of the security and benefits that might be lost with gradual phasing out of federal government farm support programs. Timothy J. Richards, K. K. Klein, and A. Walburger compare Alberta, Canada, cooperative members' objectives with those they believe to be held by their cooperatives' managers. Their analysis offers ways cooperative boards can design managerial incentive programs that better align their goals with those of the cooperative membership.

Robert P. King, David D. Trechter, and David Cobia present results from a follow-up survey of managerial compensation practices in local farm supply and marketing cooperatives in Minnesota, North Dakota, and Wisconsin. Donald A. Frederick, in an invited paper, looks at limited liability companies (LLCs), discussing their characteristics, providing background on their evolution, and comparing them to other ways of structuring business. He examines the challenges and opportunities they offer rural residents and their cooperatives.

Our thanks go out to the Journal's editorial board and to its many reviewers. These volunteers worked hard to ensure the high quality of papers presented here. We are grateful to John Dunn for his excellent work in bringing this thirteenth edition to publication.
