This work was funded, in part, by Fisheries Division, Michigan Department of Natural Resources and the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service Federal Aid in Sportfish Restoration Project F-80-R-5 (Michigan). Funding for the survey that gathered the fishing destination data from anglers was also provided by the Michigan Department of Environmental Quality. ## Fishing Sites Visited by Anglers in the Michigan Angler Panel Survey

The purpose of this report is to document the full range of sites that were visited by anglers in the survey of Michigan anglers discussed in Lupi (2004) and used in the economic modeling of Hoehn et al (1996) and Lupi et al (1998). Sites in the Hoehn et al (1996) and Lupi et al (1998) economic modeling efforts were coded at the county level by water body type because that was the level of detail required by their economic model. Due to requests for the data for state mapping purposes, and since the range of sites visited in a survey such as this might aid future investigations, the complete list of sites from the survey along with their nearest town/city were coded and provided here. Before presenting the sites, the methods for coding and locating the site is described. The complete list of 2,443 unique sites that were identified in the survey is presented at the end of the document.

The fishing sites were identified as having been visited by respondents to the Michigan Angling Panel Survey (Lupi 2004). This section describes the process of locating and coding fishing sites and expand on the presentation of Hoehn et al. (1996) and Lupi et al. (1998). That survey asked for the name, type of water body, nearest city, and county for each site a respondent reported that they fished at. In the first step for coding the fishing sites, the text names of counties were assigned a two digit county code. The code is simply the numeration of each of the counties in alphabetical order (Table 3 at the end of the document provides the county codes). The county code was used to locate the county and served as a starting point for locating sites. Next, each individual fishing site was located by consulting several sources in the following sequence:

1. Professor Higbee's Streams of Michigan. Karl Ings, ed., Vivid Publishing, Inc: Williamport, PA. 1993.
2. Humphrys, C.R., Joyce Colby and R. F. Green. Michigan Lakes and Ponds. Michigan State University: East Lansing, MI. 1965.
3. Michigan County Atlas. Universal Map Enterprises: Lansing, MI. No date.

4. Mapbook of Michigan Counties. Russell McKee, ed., Two Peninsula Press: Lansing, MI. 1984.

The Higbee manual and accompanying map provides an alphabetized listing of major lakes, rivers and ports within Michigan. An attempt was made to find each site by way of this alphabetized list. If the site name given by the respondent was found in the manual, the site was then located on the Higbee map. If located, we cross-checked the accompanying information provided by the respondent concerning the site type (Great Lake, inland lake, or river/stream), county and nearest city.

If all of the information provided by the respondent matched a site on the Higbee map, the Higbee coordinates for that site were recorded. These coordinates identify cells of the Higbee map. In addition, a simple code was created to further identify the location of sites within cells of the Higbee map (see Figure 1). The additional codes were added because the Higbee map cells are often large and can contain hundreds of lakes and several counties. These additional map coordinates should facilitate any future efforts to re-locate the site(s) on the Higbee map.

If a site was not in the Higbee manual or if a site name found in the Higbee manual grossly differed from the other descriptive site information the respondent gave, additional sources were used to try to locate the site. In the event that there were two or more listings in the Higbee manual which resembled the site name and location description provided by the respondent, the site was annotated and not coded until a more positive identification could be obtained from the respondent.

The Michigan Lakes and Ponds Survey Book (Humphrys et al) provides a detailed county by county listing of most lakes and ponds in Michigan. If the site was not located in the Higbee manual, an attempt was made to locate the site name in the Michigan Lakes and Ponds book. While the Humphrys lake and pond inventory does not provide a map, it does provide township, range and section codes for each site in a particular county. The township range codes were then used to locate the site in either the Mapbook of Michigan Counties or the Michigan County Atlas. Once a site was located in this manner, the contributing information (site type, city and county) was also checked. When a site was located and its accompanying information was confirmed, the approximate location of the site on the Higbee map (in terms of coordinates) was coded. Again, if there was any question that the site a respondent was referring to could have been two or more different sites, the site in question was annotated and not coded until a more positive identification could be made with additional information provided by the respondent.

If a site was not located through the Higbee Map or the Michigan Lakes and Ponds Survey Book, the contributing information was used in an attempt to find the site using either of the two county mapbooks (3. or 4.). For some counties, the Michigan County Atlas provides an index of hydrology, places and roads which can aid in locating a site. These sources were also useful in searching for a site whose spelling may have been slightly altered but did match the respondents description.

In the process of locating sites, the exact county of the site was coded. In some cases these county codes differed from the county names provided by the respondent. As expected, this occurred most often when a site was situated near the border of two or more counties.

All of the sites which were not able to be positively identified either because of missing information, because there was more than one site which might possibly match the respondents description, or because the site did not show up in any of the references were not given codes in the initial coding. For each of these sites, a specific follow up question was formulated to help locate the site. In the case of a respondent's usual site ("usual" sites were identified as part of the panel interview), the follow up was only asked if the respondent actually visited the site over the course of the season. The follow up questions were asked at the end of the panel survey. The follow up information was then used to help code the sites. Sites which were not clearly delineated, even after the follow up question, were assigned missing values.

Once all of the sites which could be identified were assigned Higbee map coordinates, a 4 digit site code was assigned to the site names. A code was developed to identify unique site names. Occasionally, there were multiple sites within a county which shared the same name. For these, a separate site name code was made for each additional occurrence of the site in the county. When combined with the county code, each combination of county code and site code uniquely identifies sites. The name codes were broken down into ranges and followed a roughly alphabetical order within the ranges. The numerical ranges of the codes represent types of water bodies and are given in Table 1.

Table 2 presents the complete list and identifiers for the set of sites that were mentioned as having been visited in the panel survey. In Table 2, “CODE” refers to the codes developed to identify sites, as summarized in Table 1; “SITE” refers to the name of the site; “COUNTY” refers to the two digit code for counties where counties are listed alphabetically (see Table 3); “HIGBEE” refers to the map Higbee quadrant associated with the site (see Figure 1 and its description); and “QUAD” refers to the approximate Higbee quadrant as presented in Figure 1. Sites that share the same name share the same site code. Thus, lakes with the same name that appear in different counties are identified by the combination of their site code and county code. In addition, the nearest city (as identified by the respondent when unclear, or by the coder of the sites when unambiguous) is also presented when the cities differ. Hence, for a large sites such as a large lake, there are potentially several different nearest cities coded for a a site code within a county. The reason for this is that these represent distinct locations identified by respondents.
