FARM WORKERS' ATTITUDES TO INCENTIVE SCHEMES

G. H. BRAYSHAW

UNIVERSITY OF NEWCASTLE UPON TYNE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURAL ECONOMICS

INTRODUCTION

In 1960 farmers in North East Durham and on Tweedside were asked to complete a questionnaire designed to determine their attitudes to the use of bonus schemes and piece rates in agriculture. This investigation disclosed that many farmers with no first hand experience of incentive schemes thought them to be unnecessary, ineffective or impracticable, while most farmers who had operated such schemes found them workable, and believed their advantages outweighed any disadvantages.*

Lack of interest on the part of their workers was one reason given by many farmers for not introducing incentive schemes. Some even suggested that their men were satisfied with their present standard of living, and not interested in earning more money.

In view of the attitudes held by many farmers there was obvious interest to be obtained from the views of farm workers. To this end thirty workers on Tweedside and thirty in County Durham employed by farmers who completed the original questionnaire were selected at random and asked relevant questions, which together with the answers received are presented in full in the appendix. The more notable aspects of their replies are discussed below.

Farm Workers' Attitudes to Incentive Schemes

The age of farm workers questioned on Tweedside varied from eighteen to sixty eight and averaged forty two. The County Durham men questioned were from fifteen to fifty five and averaged thirty. Age, however, seemed to have little influence on attitudes except in one or two specific cases where it was mentioned as a particular reason for disliking piece work.

Again, there was no great difference in attitudes to bonus schemes and piece rates whether the workers had first hand experience of them or not. For example, thirteen of the Tweedside workers interviewed had been paid a bonus, and twelve thought that bonus schemes offered advantages. The remaining seventeen had never received a bonus, but only one thought that bonus schemes offered no advantage.

Of the thirteen who had received a bonus eight had been paid an amount which varied according to yields, four a bonus which depended on profits, and one a proportion of the value of time saved as compared with stipulated standard performances. The amounts paid averaged £48 a year, but varied from £2 to £290.

Most farm workers, unlike the majority of farmers, seemed to favour bonus schemes and thought that they benefitted both farmer and worker. When asked what they thought were the advantages, most of the men said that bonus schemes either encouraged them or would encourage them to take more interest in their job, many adding that they enabled them to earn more. Their first reaction, therefore, was to consider how they thought bonus schemes benefitted them.

*Attitudes to Incentive Schemes and their Importance in Agriculture.Report 144G, Department of Agricultural Economics, King's College, Newcastle upon Tyne.

| Advantages claimed for | Percentage of Workers claiming |
|-----------------------------------|--------------------------------|
| Bonus Schemes | these advantages |
| Encourage interest | 82 |
| Encourage harder work | 7 |
| Encourage more conscientious work | 5 |
| Enable a man to earn more | 65 |
| Of no advantage | 12 |

Later, in answer to specific questions, the majority stated that they thought a bonus scheme made a man work faster, harder, longer and more carefully.

Percentage of Workers stating that a bonus scheme makes a man work:-

| Faster | 58 |
|----------------|----|
| Harder | 87 |
| Longer | 68 |
| More carefully | 82 |

They were more in agreement with farmers in their attitudes towards piece rates. Rather more than half liked working for a piece rate, mainly because this method of payment enabled them to earn extra money.

| Advantages claimed for | Percentage of Workers claiming |
|---------------------------|--------------------------------|
| Piece Rates | these advantages |
| Encourage interest | 25 |
| Encourage harder work | 3 |
| Enable a man to earn more | 52 |
| Of no advantage | 47 |

Nearly half the workers interviewed, however, said that they disliked piece work, chiefly because they thought that it made them overwork, and because they did not like the poor quality work which they thought it encouraged.

| Disadvantages claimed for | Percentage of Workers claiming |
|---------------------------------|--------------------------------|
| Piece Rates | these disadvantages |
| · · | |
| Disincentive effect of taxation | 2 |
| Men worked too hard | 33 |
| Possibility of poorer work | 33 |
| Insufficient extra money | 10 |
| Rates unfair in bad conditions | 7 |
| No disadvantages | 35 |

Even those who liked piece work emphasised the advantages it offered to the worker. While most thought this system made men work faster and harder, when asked specifically a large majority agreed that it encouraged them to work faster than they should. Percentage of Workers stating that piece work makes a man:-

| Work faster | 98 |
|-------------------------------|----|
| Work harder | 98 |
| Work longer | 92 |
| Work more carefully | 12 |
| Work faster than he should do | 80 |
| Work machines too quickly | 83 |
| Put less care into his work | 85 |

It is often argued that a bonus offers more incentive to greater effort if paid weekly or monthly rather than annually. However, of these workers fifty seven percent said they would prefer an annual payment because it would help them to save the extra money, or to use it to purchase some large household requirement. They argued that weekly payments would be spent on general household expenses, and therefore be of less benefit.

Percentage who would use a bonus in the following ways:-

| | If an annual bonus | If a weekly bonus |
|--------------------------------|-----------------------|-------------------|
| On ordinary household expenses | 2 | 52 |
| On some large household item | 22 | 10 |
| Saved towards a car | 8 | 5 m |
| Saved for the future | 68 | 23 |
| As part of ordinary wages | a 14 - par sam | 10 - 4 |

Most workers made it clear that not only would they value a bonus scheme because of the extra money to be earned, but also because they would regard such schemes as affording acknowledgement and gratitude for particularly good, or extra hard work:-

Percentages of Workers valuing incentive schemes as being a way of acknowledging and thanking them for particularly good work, or for extra hard work

| Bonus Schemes | 92 |
|---------------|----|
| Piece Work | 27 |

This was not, however, true of piece work. Only a minority considered such work either to be more interesting, or a method of acknowledging and thanking men for extra effort. They were, nevertheless, almost unanimous in thinking it important that they should be paid more for extra effort.

Forty two percent said that they would like the opportunity to work longer hours at the normal hourly rate, a small minority preferring their leisure to what the extra earnings would buy. The need to work overtime at busy seasons of the year was generally accepted, however, and almost all the men liked working overtime, not just when short of money or when saving for something special, but at any time when it was thought to be necessary.

General Attitudes to Agricultural Employment

On Tweedside where there is little alternative employment, nearly half the workers said that if they were able to choose again they would not undertake farmwork, although nearly all said that they found most of the work interesting.

| Percentage of Workers who:- | Tweedside | Durham |
|--|-----------|-----------|
| Would still go in for farmwork Would go in for something else | 53 47 | 87 13 |
| Find most of the work interesting Think much of the routine work boring | 87 13 | 97 3 |
| Think farmwork an important and worthwhile job Think other people do not sufficiently recognise its importance | 100 67 | 100 73 |

These workers did not, however, seem to object to the nature of the work, or even to be discontented with the level of agricultural wages. Rather they were concerned at the low status which they believed to be attached by others to their job. Most said that the work was interesting, and they were unanimous in thinking it important and worthwhile, but a large majority did not think that outsiders sufficiently recognised its importance. In County Durham where there is more opportunity of alternative employment, most said that if they were to choose again they would still do farmwork, presumably because many of the more discontented had already left farming.

Apart from liking the country and the outdoor life, many were interested in working with livestock, and in modern machinery and new developments.

| The country | 30 |
| The healthy life | 10 |
| Variety of the work | 43 |
| Work with livestock | 40 |
| Machinery and new developments | 37 |
| Working with only a few others | 5 |

Apart from bad weather very few actively disliked anything about their work, but there was strong support for more widespread establishment of pension schemes, and for further modernisation to make the work easier.

| Percentage of Workers desiring the following improve | vements:- |

| A pension scheme | 62 |
| Provision of inside work in bad weather | 2 |
| Increased sickness and accident benefits | 2 |
| Higher wages | 43 |
| Shorter hours | 3 |

Forty three percent of the workers interviewed thought that their wages were too low, and would have liked to have them raised. Dissatisfaction with the level of wages occurred more in Durham, however, where many of the men lived alongside industrial workers. Seventy percent of the Durham workers said they wanted higher wages as compared with only seventeen percent on Tweedside.

Farm Workers' Attitudes to Factors Affecting Labour Relations

In addition to their views on incentive schemes and conditions of employment, the workers interviewed were asked a number of questions relating to good labour management.

When asked in what ways they thought farmers should encourage their men to work well half said that they responded best to fairness and consideration. Many also stated that they strongly objected to being given orders too frequently, whilst a number stressed that it was important for farmers to acknowledge good work.

Percentage of Workers suggesting the following as being important ways of encouraging men to work well:-

| Acknowledging good work | 17 |
|---------------------------------------|----|
| Giving a bonus for good work | 8 |
| Being fair and considerate | |
| Not ordering men about too frequently | 27 |
| Working with the men sometimes | 8 |

A large majority thought that farmers should keep their men more informed about general policy, and that they should consult them before making changes affecting the work. In answer to a specific question most also stressed that it was important for farmers to tell their men when pleased with the work they had done. On Tweedside workers were more divided than in Durham as to whether it was desirable for farmers to make a particular man responsible for particular tasks. Many liked to do a variety of jobs, but some also argued that specialisation prevented young farm workers from learning their jobs properly.

Percentage of Workers who would like farmers to:-

| Tell their men more about what is going on | 87 |
|---|----|
| As far as possible make men responsible for particular jobs | 75 |
| Consult with the men before making changes affecting their work | 82 |
| Tell their men when pleased with their work | 92 |

Although almost unanimous in wanting extra money paid in recognition of very good work or extra effort, none wanted the extra to be paid by a wider use of piece-rates. A few thought that the extra should come by way of more opportunities of promotion, but the majority thought this to be impracticable, and would have liked bonus payments.

Percentage of Workers preferring the following ways of paying extra for very good work or extra effort:-

| Bonus payments | 67 |
|---|----|
| Wider use of piece-rates | - |
| Giving workers a share in profits | 17 |
| Providing more opportunities of promotion | 12 |

Although most were married men with dependent children, only twenty seven percent admitted to ever being worried at the thought of dismissal. Most argued that they could easily get another post. Furthermore, only half those who feared dismissal considered that it had an important influence on the amount of work they felt they must do.

Percentage of Workers stating that they:-

| Were worried by fear of dismissal | 27 |
|--|----|
| Worked harder as a result of this fear | 13 |
| Worked harder to avoid trouble | 25 |

Few admitted to being influenced in how they worked by any fears of getting into trouble with their employer, although many of those living in tied cottages agreed that this made them feel the importance of maintaining good relations with him.

Percentage of Workers: -

| Living in tied cottages | 57 |
|---------------------------------------|----|
| Considering this made it important to | |
| maintain good relations with employer | 35 |

Almost all, however, said that if their employer wanted them to stay and work well, it was just as important for him to maintain good labour relations. Nevertheless, sixty five percent said that they preferred to work for a farmer who was very strict but fair rather than easy going and giving encouragement to his mento take an interest in their jobs. A further eighteen percent thought farmers of either type were good employers.

CONCLUSIONS

There was considerable agreement among the workers interviewed as to what constituted good conditions of employment, and in their views on incentive schemes and factors influencing good labour relations.

It has been recalled that many farmers expressed the view that their workers were not interested in incentive schemes, that they were satisfied with their present standard of living, and not interested in earning more money. This may be a partly correct view. The majority of the farm workers interviewed considered that their position had been greatly improved in recent years, both financially and because mechanisation had reduced the amount of heavy and unpleasant work. Of course some still thought that they were not paid enough, and others who believed that they had enough nevertheless emphasised the importance of raising their pay and status to the same level as that of equally skilled workers in other industries. The majority, however, were reasonably satisfied with their basic pay, but would have liked the opportunity of being able to earn more.

As some farmers had suggested, many workers did not like working for a piece-rate, and none said that they would like to see this system of payment more widely applied. Most also agreed that it was impracticable to offer more opportunities of promotion. Nevertheless, all but a few made it very clear that they thought it important that they should be paid extra money in recognition of very good work and extra effort, many suggesting bonus schemes as being the fairest and most acceptable method. They agreed with many farmers that the piece-rate system often results in bad work, but they did not agree that bonus schemes have similar defects, or that they are unnecessary and ineffective. On the contrary, a large majority of the workers interviewed thought that bonus schemes encourage men to work harder and more carefully, and that they would be rarely abused.

It seems probable from these attitudes, and from the attitudes of farmers with first hand experience, that bonus schemes could help to raise productivity, to maintain good labour relations, and to improve the standard of living of agricultural workers. Such schemes are not, however, suggested as a substitute for good labour management. Apart from seeking higher status, most of the workers interviewed showed considerable independence, and made it clear that they wanted to be led and not driven. In attempting to maintain good labour relations farmers would be well advised to accept this and act accordingly, showing firmness but consideration, and keeping their workers informed about general policy.
