Cooperative Brands of Processed Foods

Why We Compiled This Directory

Members of the general public, including many people in the farmer cooperative community itself, are unaware that many of the processed food products they buy carry brand names owned by farmer cooperatives. They are unaware of the contribution cooperatives make toward providing them with a wide array of safe and nutritious foods.

A national Gallup poll in 1976 disclosed people's inability to recognize cooperative-branded foods. Seventy percent of the people interviewed could not recognize any of the four national cooperative brands among a list of eight.

Because of the general unfamiliarity with farmer cooperative products and repeated requests for lists of cooperative brands, in 1977, Agricultural Cooperative Service issued a directory of cooperatives processing and marketing food products using their own brand. Because the directory became a much requested publication, it has been updated with 1984 information. The directory has been expanded to include information on principal markets (retail, food service, or industrial bulk products) for the products listed for the convenience of food brokers and others interested in products meeting specific needs. Fluid milk products are the only category of processed foods excluded.

In some cases, the cooperative listed is a federated cooperative marketing branded products processed by its member-associations that are not listed here. In a few cases, several cooperatives share a brand but only one of the cooperatives may be listed. Also, the few cooperatives having distributor brands are excluded, such as Universal Cooperatives, Inc., of Alliance, Ohio, a federated cooperative marketing branded products under its "CO-OP" brand, some of which are processed by its member-associations.

This publication has a dual purpose: (1) to inform you of the extent that producers of agricultural products are involved in food processing and brand marketing through their cooperatives; and (2) to acquaint you with the wide array of cooperative branded food products.

If your cooperative is not included in this listing and you would like to see its brands included in subsequent editions, send the information to Agricultural Cooperative Service, U.S. Department of Agriculture, Washington, D.C. 20250.

Cooperative Brands of Processed Foods

Julie A. Hogeland

Americans annually consume several billion dollars' worth of foods marketed by farmer-owned cooperatives. Yet a majority of Americans know nothing about cooperatives or could not identify any cooperative food brands.

Agricultural cooperatives are business organizations owned and controlled by the farmers who use them. Farmer-members specialize in producing raw agricultural products. Many of the cooperatives they own process raw agricultural products and market consumer food products under cooperative brands to the retail stores where you shop.

Some of the cooperatives listed in this report specialize in processing and marketing products from a single commodity. Consequently, most are relatively small compared with some of their noncooperative competitors. Many cooperatives, however, have achieved a significant degree of success in brand marketing their members' products. You may be surprised at how many brands you know that belong to the 106 farmer-owned cooperatives providing information for this report.

Cooperative brands—more than 350 are listed here—range from AMPI to Young N'Tender. You probably recognize many as national brands, though many cooperative-branded foods are marketed in only one or more regions. Though cooperative foods are listed here under more than 230 subgroups—from almonds to zucchini, cooperative food products actually exceeded that number many times over.

Though farmer-owned cooperatives as a group are comparatively small, the 106 participating cooperatives listed in this publication had a combined business volume in 1983 estimated to be $35.3 billion. They marketed $26.1 billion in farmers' products and supplied farmers with $9.2 billion in farm supplies and services.

Individual cooperatives' marketing volume during the same period ranged from $0.6 million to $2.6 billion. A size distribution of the 106 cooperatives based on marketing volume is presented in table 1. Interestingly, some of the nationally known cooperative brands you will recognize belong to cooperatives in the smaller groups.

Participating cooperatives, scattered throughout the United States, are headquartered in 32 States (fig. 1). Some cooperatives have farmer-owners spread over one-third of the Nation; others have farmer-owners concentrated in only one or a few counties in a single State. Farmers either directly own the cooperatives listed in this publication or own local associations that in turn own a federated regional cooperative. Owner-members of the 106 cooperatives are 5,213 local associations plus 365,168 individual farmers.

Cooperatives

Cooperatives marketing food products under their brands are listed alphabetically, with mailing address. The brands are listed alphabetically in italic. The products are listed under primary product groups with letters in parentheses after each product to indicate the preserving process and principal markets, as follows.

- A = aseptic
- C = canned
- D = dry or dry packed
- F = frozen
- G = glass or bottle
- M = milled
- R = refrigerated or chilled
- V = food service trade
- X = industrial trade (bulk shipments for further processing)
- Y = retail trade

Within the listing for each cooperative, related products carrying the same marketing and processing codes are grouped.
