Increasing Food Recovery From Farmers' Markets: A Preliminary Analysis. By Charlene C. Price and J. Michael Harris. Food and Rural Economics Division, Economic Research Service, U.S. Department of Agriculture. Food Assistance and Nutrition Research Report No. 4.

Abstract

Collecting unsold food discarded at farmers' markets has the potential to allow nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations to distribute significant quantities of wholesome, unsold fruits and vegetables to needy families. Donations of this unsold produce by the participants at these markets can generate tangible benefits: increased private food assistance and better nutrition for lower income families. The Geographical Information System (GIS) analysis presented in this study indicates that there is potential to strengthen the links between farmers' markets and nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations in many areas of the United States.

Summary

More than one-quarter of the food produced in the United States may be thrown away or not used. While some of this food is nonrecoverable, other food is recoverable. Collecting food discarded at farmers' markets allows nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations to distribute donations of wholesome, unsold fruits and vegetables to needy families. Strengthening ties between farmers' markets and nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations (that is, food banks, food pantries, food rescue programs, etc.) could generate tangible benefits: increased food assistance and better nutrition for lower income families.

Geographical Information System (GIS) analysis identifies locations across the country where farmers' markets and food organizations are in close enough proximity for food to be donated easily. If farmers' markets are not currently donating food, this type of information could improve or strengthen ties between local farmers' markets and food organizations.

Many farmers' markets already donate unsold fruits and vegetables to nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations, and many organizations know where farmers' markets are located in their local areas. One obstacle, however, to further expanding cooperation is lack of information and coordination. In other words, nonprofit food organizations need to know about the farmers' markets in their local areas and donors at farmers' markets need to know about the food organizations in their local areas.

This study uses GIS analysis to identify areas in the United States with large numbers of farmers' markets near local nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations. These areas include the 28 local nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations located within 30 miles of the largest numbers of farmers' markets. The report provides detailed information on farmers' markets, such as name, address, telephone number, and contact person. Similar detailed information is also presented for each food organization.

Improved information sharing, identifying locations of farmers' markets and food organizations, and reducing transportation and other logistical constraints should facilitate a better working relationship between potential donors from farmers' markets and nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations in local areas.

Increasing Food Recovery From Farmers' Markets

A Preliminary Analysis

Charlene C. Price
J. Michael Harris*

Introduction

Food recovery is the collection, or recovery, of wholesome food from farmers' fields, retail stores, or food-service establishments for distribution to the poor and hungry. Recovery is a good way to fight hunger in the United States because it makes use of wholesome food that would otherwise be discarded. Recovery efforts become even more important when one looks at the significant amounts of wholesome, edible food that is thrown away every day. USDA estimates that more than one-quarter of all food produced in the United States is discarded (Kantor, Lipton, Manchester, and Oliveira, 1997). Although some discarded food is nonedible, other discarded food is edible and, if located near nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations, can be used to provide food assistance to low-income Americans. Discarded food from farmers' markets is no exception.

Recovery of wholesome, unsold fruits and vegetables from farmers' markets can provide a significant source of potential donations to nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations (that is, food pantries, food banks, etc.) and, in turn, to low-income Americans. Not only could recovery increase food assistance, but it could also improve nutrition for low-income families because it could increase consumption of fresh fruits and vegetables. As part of USDA's Food Recovery and Gleaning Initiative, the Department has launched an initiative to expand food recovery from farmers' markets by facilitating donations of unsold fruits and vegetables to nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations for distribution to needy individuals and families.

USDA initiated a pilot program in 1997 which matched producers in the farmers' market setting with nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations in the Washington, DC, area. Over 8,000 pounds of food were recovered during 3 months of 1997 and over 12,000 pounds of food during 5 months of 1998. The success of these efforts has spawned considerable interest in expanding such programs to other areas in the United States.

Further evidence shows that recovery of unsold fruits and vegetables from local food donors is important. The following numbers reflect total local donations. These donors may include farmers' markets, retailers, restaurants, and even food processors. Recovery efforts at one organization in the Syracuse, NY, area are netting about 25 million pounds of fruits and vegetables a year (Food Bank of Central New York, 1998). We were able to determine that most of these donations came from a local wholesale market. However, significant donations from farmers' markets are included in this number. One food bank in Washington, DC, also reported donations approaching 1 million pounds of food in 1998 (D.C. Central Kitchen, 1998).

ing organizations, and many organizations know where farmers' markets are located in their local area. However, one impediment to further expanding cooperation is the lack of information and coordination needed to strengthen ties in local areas. In other words, nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations need to know numbers and locations of farmers' markets in their local areas. Conversely, donors at farmers' markets need to know that food organizations exist in their local areas and that potential losses can be turned into useful donations. A successful relationship also depends on sufficient densities (numbers) of farmers' markets in local areas to make it worthwhile for organizations to assemble donations in quantities that are large enough to make collections worthwhile. Large numbers of markets in close proximity keep collection costs low.

This report presents information about local areas in the United States with large numbers of farmers' markets near local nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations. The report also addresses the information and coordination problem by providing information on farmers' markets and nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations in these areas.

Theoretical Construct

Efficient food recovery must take economics into account—specifically, spatial economics. Three factors are particularly relevant here. First, there must be wholesome (edible), unsold fruits and vegetables and willing donors (supply). Second, nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations must use fruits and vegetables in their assistance efforts (demand). Third, these supplies and demands must be separated spatially (geographically), necessitating the collection and transporting of any donations from farmers' markets. The latter factor is very important because transport costs increase with distance.

To illustrate this concept, we assume that supplies and demands exist in a local area, and the number of farmers' markets are uniformly distributed within the area. We further assume equal supplies of donations at these markets. The economic relationship between recovery cost and the volume of donations in a local area can be depicted graphically (Bressler and King, 1970). Figure 1 depicts the relationship between the quantity collected and transportation costs for two different areas with different densities (numbers) of farmers' markets.

Collection costs increase as the size of the collection area around the organization increases. In other words, the farther an organization or volunteer has to travel to pick up donated food, the higher the cost. Therefore, a higher density (number) of farmers' markets in close proximity results in lower transportation costs. Conceptually, organizations will assemble donations from an area of such size or radius that transport costs would not exceed the cost of purchasing fruits and vegetables at local wholesale markets. From an economic efficiency standpoint, and at some distance and size of area, it is cheaper to purchase these products than to pay the costs to drive out to distant locations and collect donations.¹

Based on this rationale, organizations have a collection area with a radius determined by economic cost, and costs will be lower in areas with high densities (numbers) of farmers' markets.² Therefore, areas with large numbers of farmers' markets in close proximity to ¹This may not be the case if collection and transportation are donated by volunteers. In this case, fuel is an out-of-pocket cost and there is no direct cost to the organization. But from an economic efficiency standpoint, minimization of transport costs is optimal.

²There is an exception to this argument. One farmers' market in a local area conceivably could be large enough to supply sufficient donations to a local private food organization. To date, we have not isolated an example where this is the case.

Effect of volume and density on collection costs food recovery and gleaning organizations have the highest potential for successful recovery relationships. We concentrate on these local areas in this study.

Methodology

Numbers and locations of farmers' markets and non-profit food recovery and gleaning organizations were determined from several sources, including USDA publications and Internet web pages (see references). We identified over 2,812 farmers' markets (Johnson and others, 1998) and 440 nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations (USDA, 1999) across the United States (table 1). These numbers may not include all farmers' markets and nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations because farmers' markets continually enter and exit markets and local areas. Also, while larger nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations were included in this analysis, other types were excluded. Tens of thousands of food pantries and hot meals programs that distribute food to individual families or neighborhoods were not included.

This study focuses on the larger nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations that collect and distribute excess food on a citywide, countywide, multicounty, or statewide basis (table 1). Spatial analysis of these data allowed us to identify areas where densities (numbers) of farmers' markets were highest relative to local organizations. We assumed that nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations have collection areas within a 30-mile radius (2,826 square miles). However, no specific information exists about the size of collection areas. We selected 30 miles based on telephone conversations with a few recovery and gleaning organizations.

ArcView Geographical Information System (GIS) software was used to conduct a spatial analysis of the locations of farmers' markets and nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations. ArcView organizes spatial attribute data (data concerning specific locations and geography) and presents it graphically. The software contains boundary data points for State, county, zip code, and study area boundaries, as well as latitudinal and longitudinal reference points for locations of nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations and farmers' markets. Actual addresses were not used in this analysis. Zip code centroids (geographic centers) were used as the mapping reference point for all food assistance organizations and farmers' markets contained in each zip code.

Findings

National sales of fresh fruits and vegetables at farmers' markets are estimated to be about $1.2 billion a year (Johnson and others, 1996). Recovery of wholesome, unsold fruits and vegetables from farmers' markets has the potential to provide food donations that can be distributed by nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations around the country. Many farmers' markets are already donating to nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations. Table 1 presents the total number of farmers' markets and organizations by State. California has the largest number of farmers' markets and food recovery organizations—301 and 51, respectively—followed by New York and Pennsylvania.

Locations of Farmers' Markets and Food Recovery Organizations

Figures 2 and 3 depict the distribution of farmers' markets and food recovery organizations across the United States. The dots depict zip code centroids containing farmers' markets and nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations. The largest densities of matchings are located on the west coast, in the East, and in the Midwest. California has the largest number of combined markets and organizations, followed by New York and then Pennsylvania.

Concentrations of Local Farmers' Markets and Organizations

To better facilitate a successful linkage between farmers' markets and food organizations, both entities must be located in reasonable proximity. Figure 4 shows concentrations of farmers' markets relative to organizations within a 30-mile radius of the food organizations' zip code centroid. The figure shows much higher concentrations in some areas relative to others. The dots (see legend) in figure 4 show the highest concentrations of potential donation sites (farmers' markets). The darkest dots represent high densities (numbers) of farmers' markets. These areas have 69-95 farmers' markets relative to local nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations' zip codes. The next level has 39-68 farmers' markets relative to local nonprofit food recovery and gleaning organizations. We have selected areas depicting the two highest density levels (39-68 and 69-95) to represent areas where the greatest feasibility of strengthening ties exists.

Distribution of farmers' markets

For actual numbers of farmers' markets for each selected area, see appendix tables 2-29. We arbitrarily selected the five intervals (1-9, 10-21, 22-38, 39-68, and 69-95). We were unable to find information or publications defining the relationship between probability of successful recovery and local concentrations of farmers' markets in local areas.

The highest densities of farmers' markets relative to food recovery and gleaning organizations appeared on the west coast and in the Midwest and Northeast. Highest densities tended to be in or around metropolitan areas in these regions (figs. 5, 6, and 7). On the west coast, California, especially Los Angeles, Oakland, Berkeley, Pasadena, Compton, Santa Monica, and Long Beach, had the highest densities (numbers) of farmers' markets within a 30-mile radius of food recovery and gleaning organizations (fig. 5).

On the east coast, Washington, DC; Alexandria, VA; Columbia, MD; Annapolis, MD; New York, NY; Mineola, NY; Hillside, NJ; Bronx, NY; Nyack, NY; Millwood, NY; Stamford, CT; Dorchester, MA; and Boston, MA, had the high densities of farmers' markets (fig. 6). In the Midwest, areas with high concentrations of farmers' markets in close proximity included Chicago, IL, and Gary, IN (fig. 7).

Most of these farmers' markets are open-air seasonal. That is, they are located outdoors for a limited time usually during the late spring, summer, and early fall. Most of the year-round farmers' markets were located in California. However, a few were in New York, the Maryland/DC/Virginia area, and Massachusetts.

Appendix table 1 shows the 28 food recovery organizations across the United States that have the highest concentrations (39-95) of farmers' markets within a 30-mile radius. Appendix tables may contain some overlap of farmers' markets because the markets may be in proximity of more than one food organization in a zip code area. These are local areas where high density (numbers) may keep collection costs to a minimum. These costs are important to organizations because most pick up the majority of their local donations.

Appendix tables 2-29 show a detailed list of farmers' markets within a 30-mile radius of the 28 food recovery and gleaning organizations. Other pertinent information is given, such as the address of the market, telephone number, contact person, and type of market, to enable successful communication between farmers' markets and food organization personnel.

Among the zip codes reflecting the 28 selected food recovery and gleaning organizations, the zip code centroid (geographic center) containing the most farmers' markets was located in New York City, which had 95 farmers' markets.

Limitations of the Study

The GIS analysis identifies several zip code centroids and metropolitan areas that have high concentrations of farmers' markets relative to local food assistance organizations. We present these results as areas with a strong feasibility of linking farmers' markets and non-profit food recovery and gleaning organizations. However, the depictions shown in this report reflect numbers and locations (markets and organizations) based only on the centers of zip codes. The results are based solely on numbers of farmers' markets, not actual quantities sold at these markets, nor the actual amounts of unsold fruits and vegetables that would be donated. Data on actual quantities would further enhance the feasibility analysis. Also, actual locations (specific addresses for farmers' markets) were not used in the analysis. Therefore, the corresponding street and road infrastructure could not be included in the analysis. Lack of actual address data precluded us from further examining the routing and transport costs associated with pickup.

Future Research

The information presented in this analysis reflects a first step toward a definitive analysis of potential food recovery from farmers' markets. Further study should focus on case studies of potential and actual linkages. Case studies of the high-feasibility communities shown in this analysis would provide better information about quantities sold and potential donations from local farmers' markets. Organizations could also be surveyed to determine their use of fruits and vegetables in their programs. Individual organizations interested in starting or increasing food donations from farmers' markets could also conduct their own local feasibility studies. Phone numbers and addresses contained in this publication provide enough information in high-feasibility areas to initiate a feasibility study in these local communities.
